A glass vessel containing co-existing vapor and liquid phases of carbon dioxide at approximately 70 atm is heated, causing the contents to transform completely to the vapor state. As the system slowly cools and approaches the critical point, the phenomenon of "critical opalescence" may be observed.