Two pieces of uncharged pith are suspended by strings so that they are separated by approximately one half of an inch. When one of the pieces is electrostatically charged and released the two pieces of pith are momentarily attracted and then repel.